POTOMAC PATTER

Moral in a Bust

Allen Dulles, our boss spy, has two offices over at the headquarters of the Central Intelligence Agency. One, of them, tucked away among a row of similar rooms occupied by subordinates, has been converted into a kind of trophy room, and in one corner is a bust of Herman Goering, with its face turned to the wall.

Mr. Dulles explains to visitors that the bust was captured during World War II. "Somebody's always turning it face front," he complains. "I want it the other way to emphasize the oblivion which was the man's fate."
